However, I would suggest you still read the first part of the post, which delves into how you can get the most out of your conversation practice.Most topics have two sides to argue on. You can pick either of the side favor or against or sometimes just take an entirely different direction. For example, if the discussion topic is should laptops be allowed in classrooms? you can argue either in favor of the topic (allow laptops in classrooms) or against it (dont allow laptops in classrooms).Few minutes before you start speaking, make a regular 1-2 mistakes that wont repeat. Even if youve to go slow or take other measures to curb these mistakes, do it. Thats how you strengthen your argument. For example, you can narrate your or someone elses experience of how distracting use of laptop in the classroom was.When the other person is speaking, dont think of what you would say next. Listen. And listen. If you listen, you would be able to counter his point if you dont agree with it or build on what he said if youve more to say on it. A good response takes cues from what the other person said and reacts to it, and doesnt get fixated on what youve already prepared.Most people just hang up after finishing speaking, which isnt the best way. Instead, you should spend few minutes analyzing what went right and what went wrong. Few areas of improvement would be obvious to you, but few can be discovered through feedback from the other person. Identifying your mistakes is gold. Work on them. Thats the fastest way to improve. If you dont critique your performance and take corrective steps, your communication skills would barely improve even after years of practice.Few logistical points to note on the topics that follow:1. Whereas most topics are in the form of question (example: Should violent video games be banned?), some are statements (example: Real learning doesnt happen in a classroom). Few end in three dots (example: If I were invisible for a day), which means you can take the topic whichever way you want.2. Whatever the topic, make sure to answer why youre taking the stand even if it is not explicitly asked. Otherwise, your reply would end in seconds. For example, if you dont answer why for the topic what is the best letter in English alphabet?, you would finish in a blink.3. Try to speak for at least five minutes, the longer the better.Without further ado, here are more than 150 topics on hold conversation or make speech. Theyre been arranged in three categories beginner, intermediate, and advanced depending on the difficulty level of the topic. Feel free to download the topics as a PDF (link at the end of the page).If youre a learner or teacher of English language, you can help improve websites content for the visitors through a short survey.1.
